

Judith Blum Reddy

The art of Judy Blum may have discovered its rational moorings in genres of creation we associate with New York in the 1970s (thinking precisely of the disciplines of Minimalism, Conceptualism and Process Art) but it may have found its raison d'être in the cultures (both ancient and contemporary) of India.

Blum has a fascination with lists, usually lists of names, and the simple ordering of these lists supplies her with a program for making art. Drawing can be as simple as finding, composition can be relinquished to an indexical given. A type of concrete poetry is made visible while a paced litany renders language abstract, meditative or even comically onomatopoeic.

Judy Blum's art combines the maniacal accounting of the bureaucrat with the incomprehensible babbling of the hysteric. Order and chaos are mutual concerns while the comfort of repetition and the ease of simplicity mask a troubling irrationality. Judy Blum's purity of both form and intention posits a smooth sliding scale with which to measure the mundane as well as the uncanny. The artist's limitation of means complements a hysterical excess and is nothing less than a direct approach from which to go around in circles.

Artist's Statement

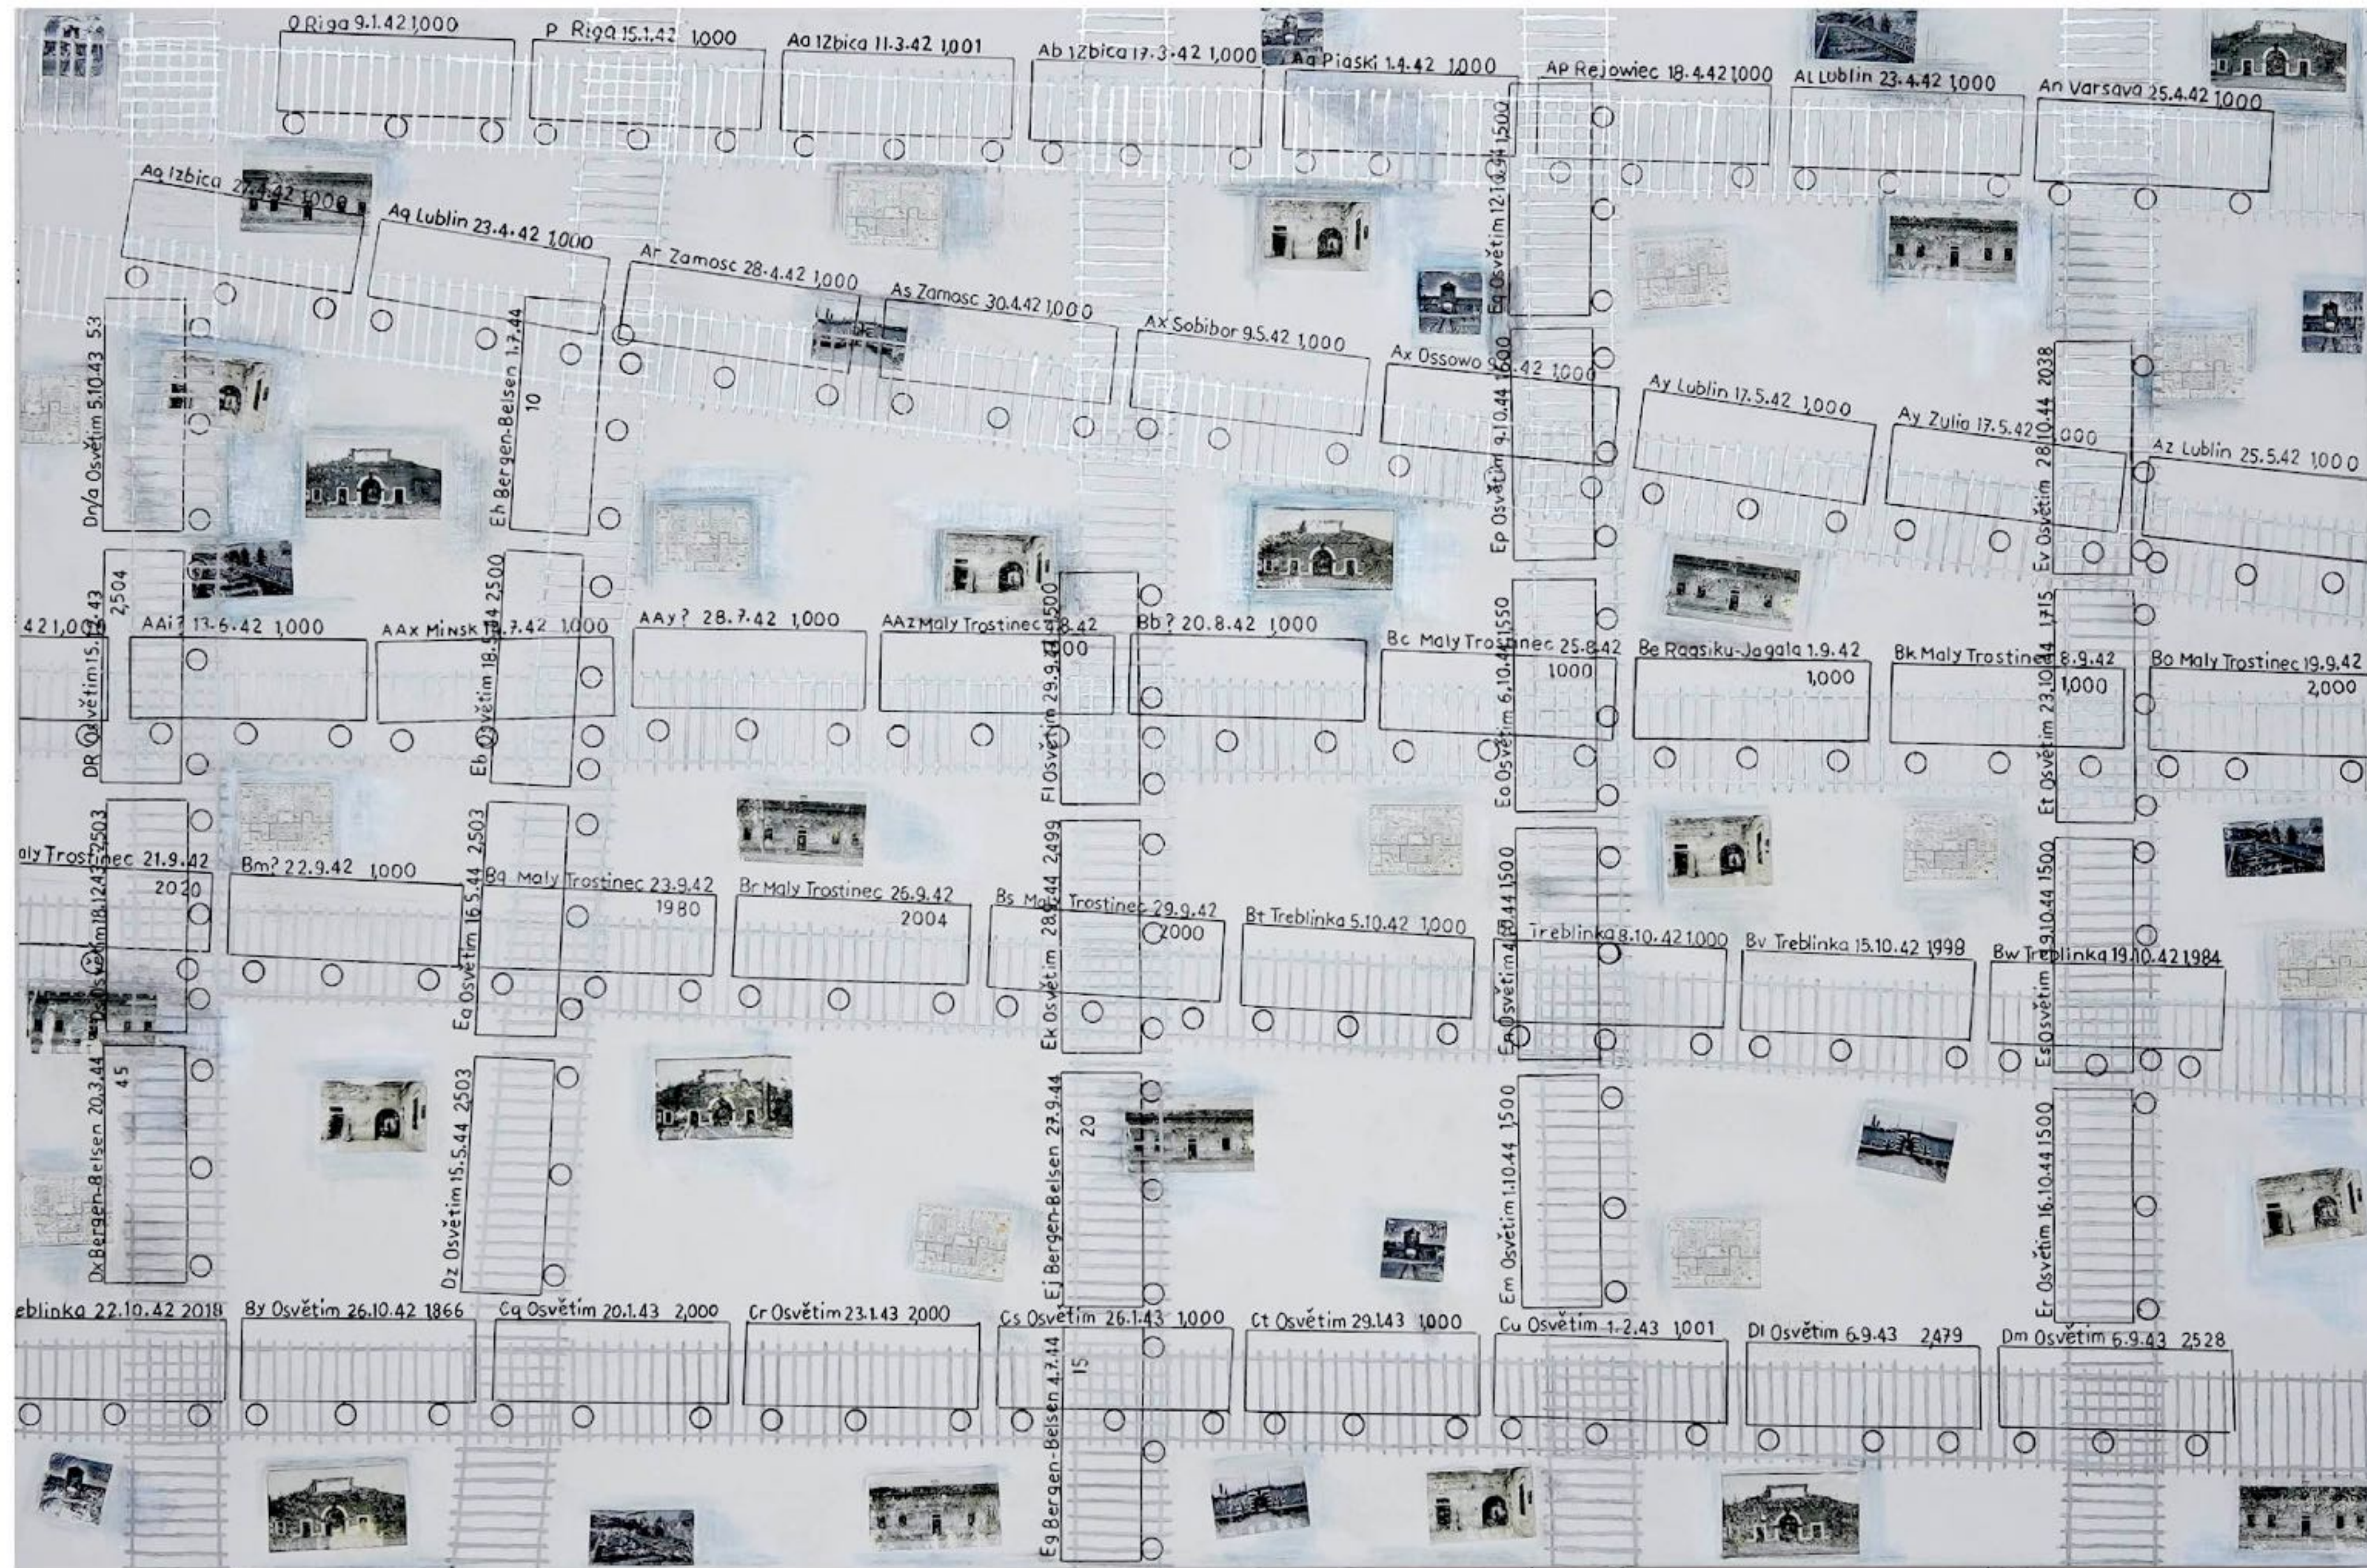

I attach ideas to aesthetics in my practice through the act of drawing. I trained at Cooper Union and a lot of my work has numerous forms and figures that are drawing critiques of contemporary culture and socio-political reckoning. Some of my drawing is an act of liberation that is not seen as radical, but as reminders of the wrongs, the changes needed, and a hopeful future. My drawings enact those very emotions, an aesthetic that sits within many planes as my work can be auto-portraiture, like a landscape of Paris notifying its' immigrant neighborhood, or a satire that critiques Indian bureaucracy. I imagine so I draw. I cannot replace these acts with any other method of visual creation and representation. The disorder completes the art work and the drawings and lists make my story. List making are exercises of satire, which is my conceptual practice to which drawing is an essential element. My works are a departure from the canons of western art history - rather they are a merging or assimilation of several traditions due to the appropriation of images with my drawings .

TROOPS ON THE BORDER

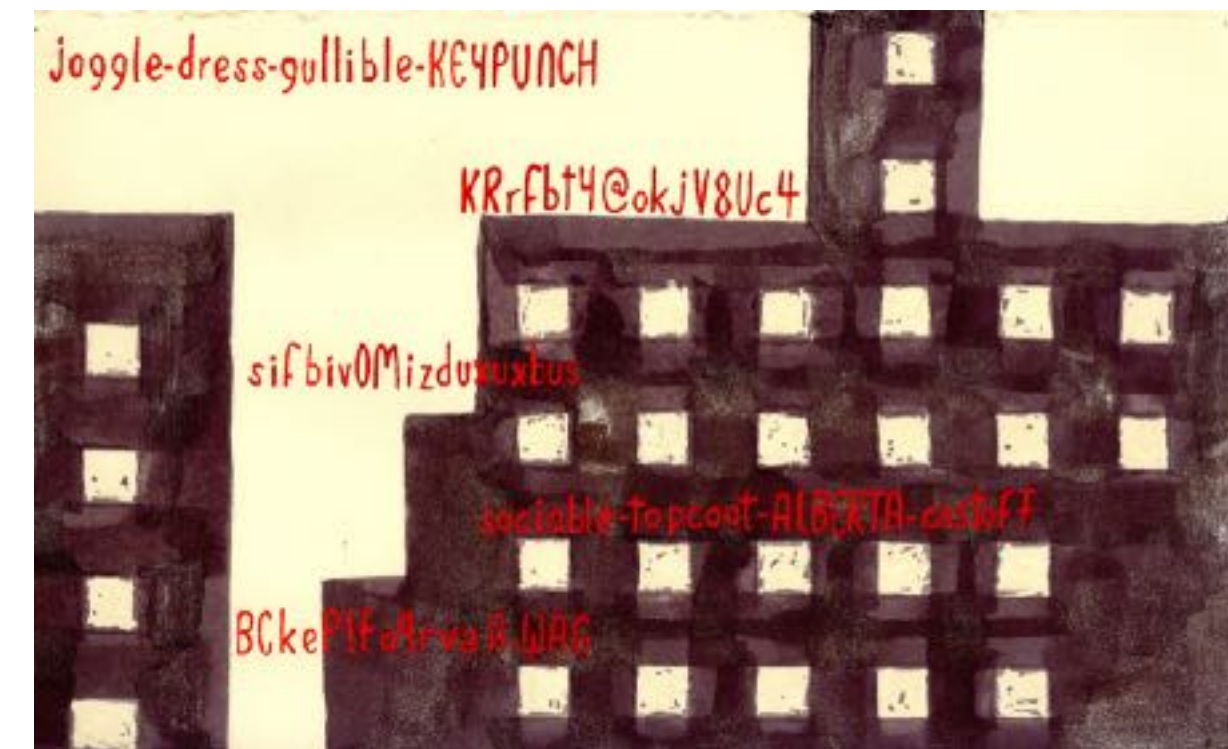

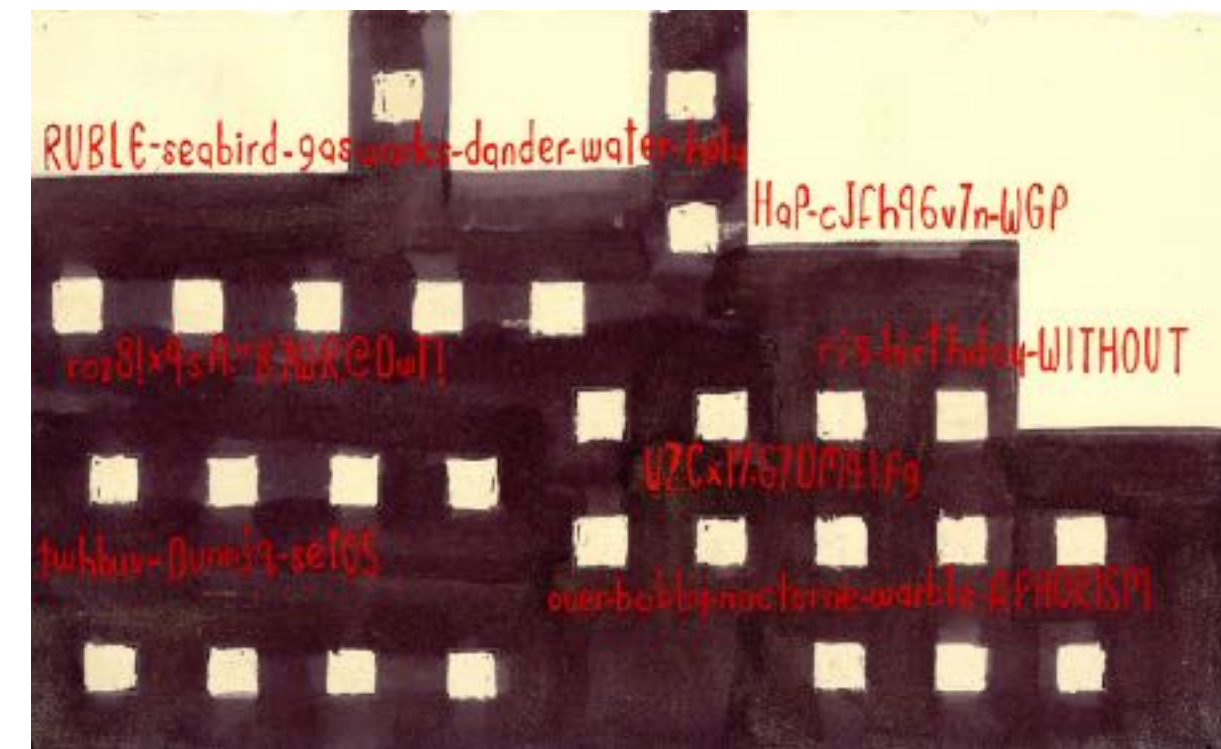

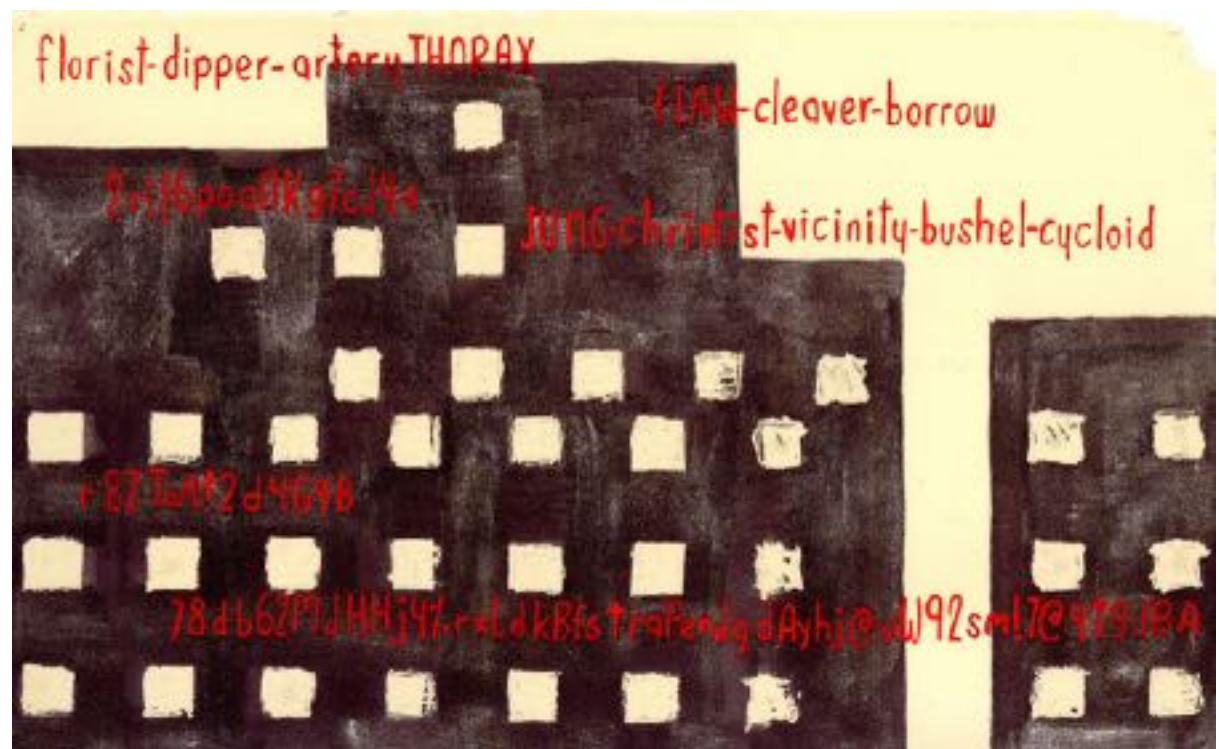

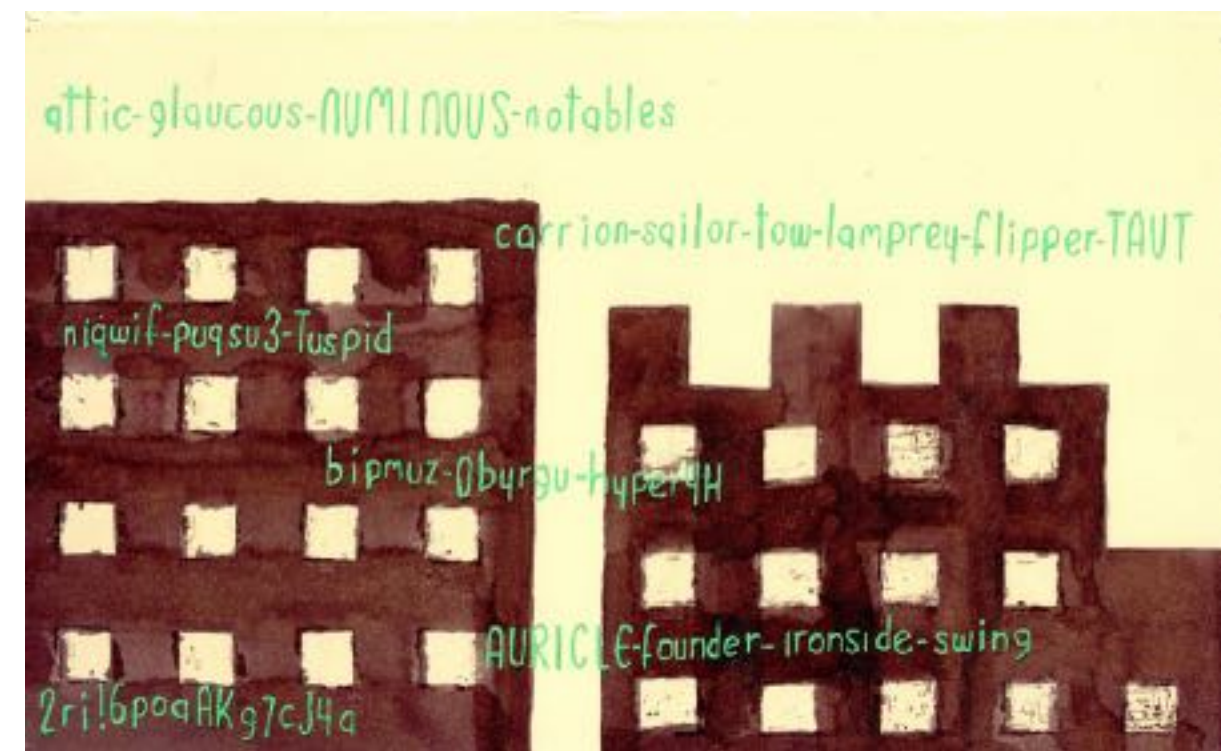

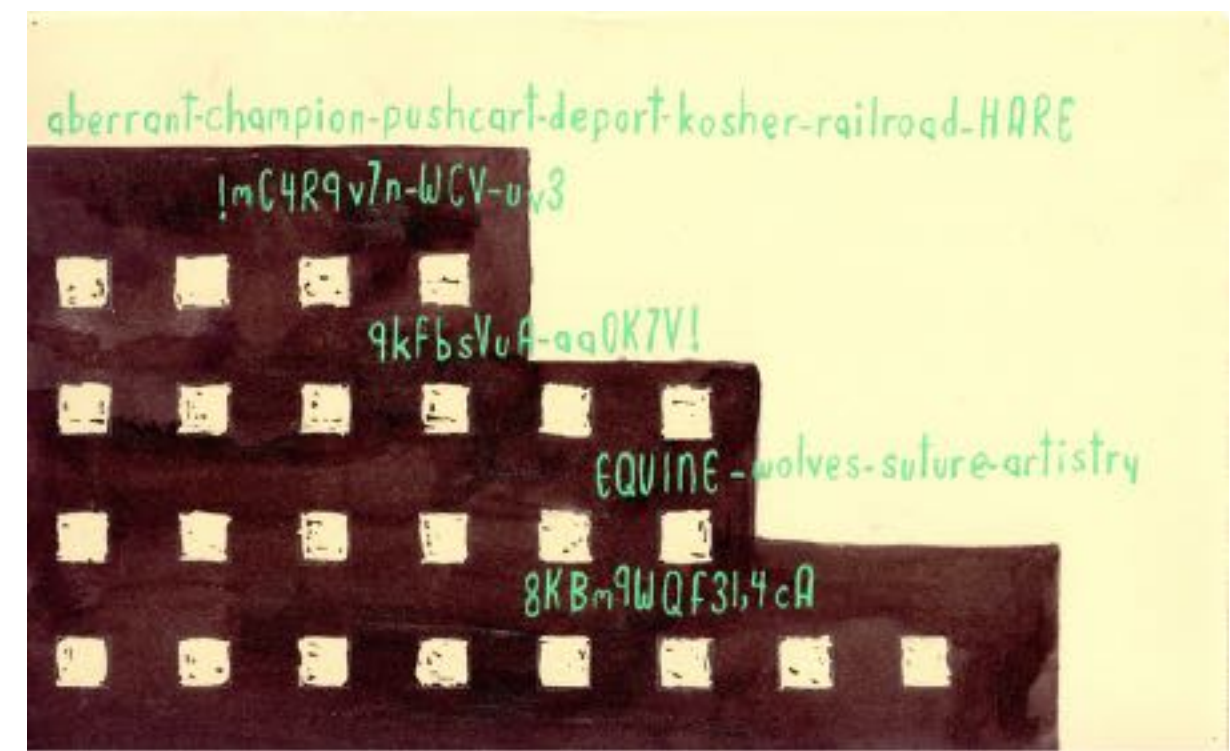

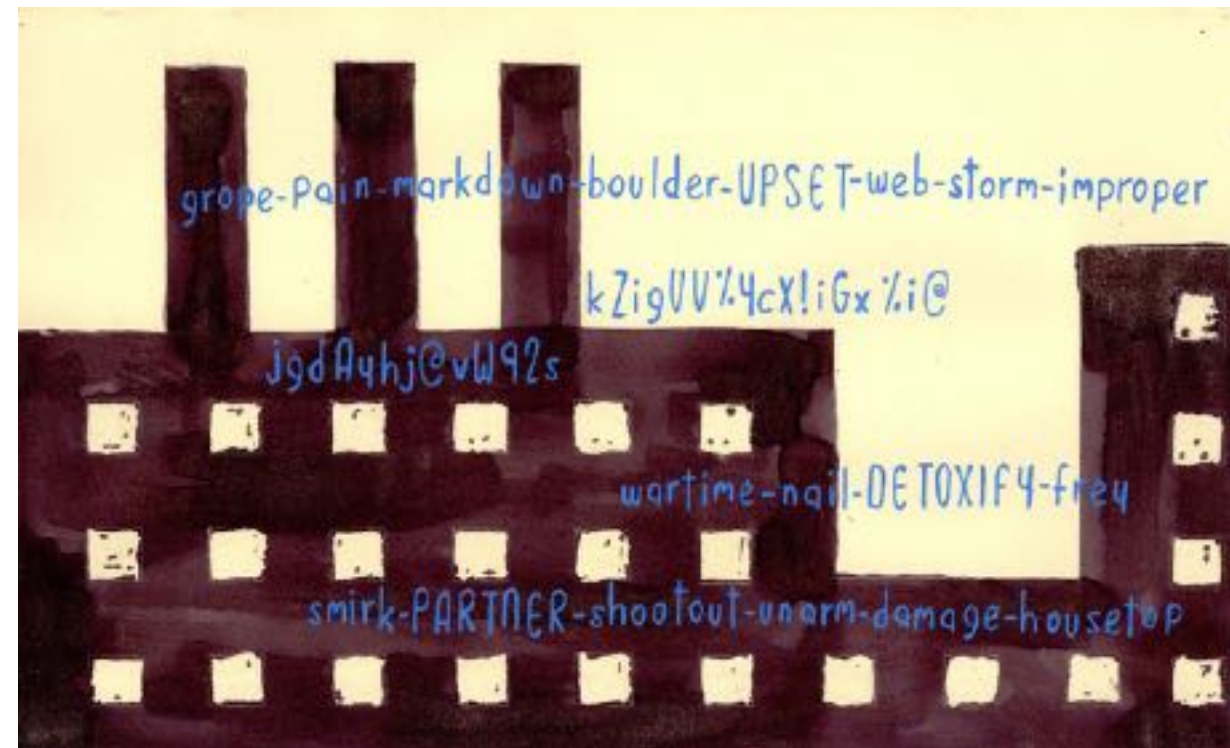

A hand-drawn sketch on aged, yellowish paper. The drawing consists of various lines: a grid of horizontal and vertical lines in the upper left; a series of vertical lines in the upper center; a large, irregular shape on the right; and a complex, overlapping pattern of solid and dashed lines in the lower half. The text "no end in sight" is written in a simple, lowercase font across the middle of the page, positioned between two horizontal dashed lines.
